Short Circuit Analysis

The short circuit analysis is done to find the fault current at any point in the system. It is done to find the maximum current that can flow through the system during a fault. This is done by assuming that the fault is a short circuit and the voltage is zero. The fault current is then calculated by using the equivalent circuit of the system. The fault current is then used to find the fault level and the fault level is used to find the fault level.

The fault current is then used to find the fault level and the fault level is used to find the fault level.

The fault current is then used to find the fault level and the fault level is used to find the fault level.
